This invention relates to an apparatus for testing the mechanical characteristics of prosthetic devices used to replace human joint structures. More particularly, this invention relates to a universal testing apparatus that may be used to test the modulus of elasticity, the flexural moment, and the torsion modulus, of artificial joint structures such as knee and hip prostheses. It is currently believed that the future of artificial joint replacement will involve articulating mechanisms that have the artificial joint components formed of materials that are substantially homogeneous to the structure of the natural joint surfaces, and that match the native loading characteristics of the natural joint. These surfaces, therefore, must undergo appropriate surface treatment to establish appropriate surface texture, roughness and chemistry. In addition, the artificial joint must be secured within the natural bone or joint by bonding which establishes an intimate association between the two surfaces. To establish that an appropriate bond is achieved between the two surfaces of the joint, it is necessary to subject the bonded surfaces to an appropriate testing regimen that establishes the degree of bonding between the two surfaces. Thus, it is desirable to establish that the bond between the artificial joint and the natural joint surface is of sufficient strength to support the loading necessary for normal activity, and to establish that the bond between the artificial joint and the natural bone is able to withstand cyclic loading of the natural joint for the expected life of the joint. It is desirable, therefore, to subject the artificial joint to a testing regimen to establish that the bond is sufficiently strong and resistant to cyclic loading to meet the requirements of this activity. Thus, it is desirable to establish the modulus of elasticity of the artificial joint, to determine the flexural moment of the artificial joint, and to determine the torsion modulus of the artificial joint. Although a variety of apparatus have been used to establish the modulus of elasticity of artificial joints and to determine the flexural moment and the torsion modulus of the joints, it has not been appreciated that all of the apparatus used for these purposes should be capable of testing joints having a variety of different geometries. Moreover, the need for testing various prosthetic

I want to say something about tech.news: This post is very informative and helpful for me. I was interested in this post and so I think I've found it. I am sure that I will find many more of its kind articles and I hope to understand more of this subject in the future. I thank you so much for writing such an useful and interesting post and I think I'll enjoy it. Thank you so much for these smart ideas you shared with us. This site has actually given us a very brilliant solution to the problem. I believe that you are extremely knowledgeable in this subject. Since I also believe you have some very bright ideas and views on this, I want to direct people to where you can read more on the topic. I did enjoy reading this post and I hope you continue to do so. I really hope to see you pay a visit to my blog and read more at one of these days. To qualitatively explore the experiences of medical students enrolled in a preclerkship leadership development program. A qualitative descriptive method using focus groups (n=10). Free-standing, not-for-profit community hospital in a major metropolitan area. Volunteer participants in the Leadership of Tomorrow (LOT) program. Students participating in LOT participated in five 1-hour focus groups at three sessions. Thematic analysis was used to analyze the data. Two major themes emerged. The first was about the impact of the program on the participants: students' increased awareness of the need for leadership, and the development of personal leadership styles and skills. The second was about the mentoring process: participants' appreciation of the time spent with their mentors, the development of mentors as role models, and the importance of staff nurses in the role of mentors. Student perceptions of the LOT program were overwhelmingly positive. The program provided the leadership experiences that students desired. However, a more structured approach to the mentoring process and a greater degree of follow-up with participants would be beneficial.Cervical Leishmaniasis in a Pediatric
