While it has since been replaced by the new Nexus 6, you can still get the old one, albeit with a couple of caveats. The currently free-for-life Nexus 5, while it was originally sold by Google as a flagship device, remains affordable because it lacks flagship features. The battery life is not stellar, and the software is still a little too new and poorly designed for regular use. As far as features go, it's basically just a vanilla Android phone with a few neat Google additions like Google Now, an HD display and a fingerprint scanner. If you're willing to live without flagships, the Nexus 5 is a good deal. The problem is that Google has sold its share of these phones to another company, and that company has decided to stop selling the devices altogether. Nexus 5 users
