From a teenage jackass to a bookseller in North Carolina who has to send me email scams every other day, I have owned and given away some pretty pricey books. But I've also given away some pretty expensive books. I've bought books just to give away, books on spec, and have always been able to sell and re-sell them, and make a bit of cash. But if I were to estimate the total value of all the books I've donated or been gifted over the years, I'm certain it would well exceed the homes of many, and the bookshelves of most. I would love to be able to do the same. But the opportunities are rarely so sudden. That is a guest post from Michael Farbman, the Executive Director of the Brooklyn Public Library. His full post can be found here, but here's a taste: I've always loved books and from an early age, I've been a reader. My father read to me, taught me to read, and when I was old enough, I taught myself, reading novels first, and then educational books. I went to school to study library science and when I saw my mother reading in the subway as a teenager, it was my first glimpse of how books could touch people in a way I'd never seen before. I'm not sure exactly when I fell in love with the library. I remember a lot of books in my parents' bookstore in South Slope, the University of Chicago, and around town. Maybe it was the smell of the libraries in the suburbs, where we moved, or maybe it was my first forays into the bookshop at the Brooklyn Public Library. But I fell in love with the library the moment I was introduced to it. Despite my love, I remained a shy, quiet, often intimidated, librarian until I was in my mid-twenties. It wasn't until I left my post as cataloger
