comfortable.Major Credit Reporting Bureaus To Launch Legal Actions Share Article The credit reporting bureaus are required to remove out-of-date reports in response to the Library of Congress' Protecting Data Subjects Act. The FICO® Credit Score is our most important metric, for it measures consumers' financial health and future ability to pay. To win significant market share, I need the best data, and that means using the best data in our products Philadelphia, PA (PRWEB)November 19, 2011 The major credit reporting agencies (also known as CRAs) are gearing up to launch legal actions under the new federal law, known as the Protecting Data Subjects Act, to force consumers to correct outdated adverse reports, according to FICO, the leading provider of predictive analytic solutions for assessing and managing consumer credit risk. If the credit reporting agencies do not enforce the law, they could face civil fines of $100,000 for the first violation and $25,000 per violation per day after the first 30 days. Additionally, the law allows the government to deny CRAs access to important consumer credit data. The law was introduced on June 7, 2010, and became effective on September 30, 2010.
