That's right, until now. When you need to know something, you want it to be accurate, comprehensive, and - most of all - up to date. But as the information age continues to revolutionize the way we live and work, a familiar phrase comes to mind:.The North Carolina General Assembly voted to kill the death penalty, abolish the state's Department of Public Safety, and reduce the size of the General Assembly. Lawmakers also decided to pass a bill requiring students to wear uniforms in schools, and yet not allow a Democratic member of the Senate to cast a vote. The death penalty repeal passed on Monday by the Senate 30-19. North Carolina is the 13th state since the United States Supreme Court reinstated the death penalty in 1976 to repeal it. The bill is now headed to the desk of Gov. Roy Cooper, a Democrat. "North Carolina senators have chosen their constituents,” said Rep. Chris Millis, R-Wake, the bill’s House sponsor.

“They have chosen to repeal the death penalty, which is good for the state.” Only one Republican senator voted for the repeal. Thirty Democrats voted in favor of repealing the death penalty. Five Democrats voted against repeal. Republicans also won the day in the House, where the tally was 70 to 56 in favor. Republicans passed a law in 2016 that requires government employees in North Carolina to wear clothes that highlight the state’s Confederate heritage and white supremacy. Democrats say their version is merely an attempt to combat racism and is not about the Confederacy. Rep. Ed McMullen, a Democrat from Morrisville, was the only one who spoke out against the anti-racism bill. He said members of the House and Senate Majority must stand up to slavery.
