Effect of Nitrogen and Dopamine on Reducing the ECG-Determined Heart Rate Variability in the Rat. Heart rate variability (HRV) is a measure of the regularity of time intervals between heartbeats and is usually measured via electrocardiogram (ECG). The objectives of this study were to determine whether reduced HRV could be detected in ECG-determined recordings of the heart rate (HR) in a resting state, and determine whether dopamine administration was able to increase the HRV. HR was measured in male Fischer 344/N rats using ECG for a continuous 24-h recording period and for 2-h segments at three time points: pre-dopamine administration (resting state), post-dopamine administration (acute heart rate response), and post-dopamine administration (resting state). Individual segment HRV was determined as the median resultant power of all QRS-RR intervals from each of the corresponding segments. No significant effect was found between all combinations of the following factors: Time x Sex x Group. HRV was lower in the DOP and DA groups than in the CON group when using segments comprising whole recordings or when using segments comprised of 1 h following the dopamine infusion (p /  Copyright 2002-2019 the original author or authors.  Licensed under the Apache License, Version 2.0 (the "License"); * you may not use this file except in compliance with the License. * You may obtain a copy of the License at * * * * Unless required by applicable law or agreed to in writing, software * distributed
