Titan Macht The Titan Macht (German: Titan Macht) is a triacylglycerol fuel made of 50% oil and 50% ethanol, with a 32 octane. The name translates to "Titan power". The product was created in Europe by combining smaller bio-diesels, with a focus on rapeseed. The idea came from a German car company that made blended fuel for their diesel engines. However, they were looking to produce an ethanol-based, while bio-diesels were not able to meet their demands. After study, research, and development, Titan was able to produce a blend that could hold its own against many existing diesel fuels. The product is sold for use in Land Rover trucks in the United Kingdom, and in the United States primarily as a fuel additive, with a sales target of 100 million liters in the US by 2020. In some areas the blend is mixed with gasoline to make it more suitable for everyday use. However, the use of ethanol as a fuel for cars has not yet been adopted in widespread use, mainly because of the costs to buy an ethanol blend vs. a traditional blend. A new spatiotemporal analysis of IES5 in Drosophila melanogaster: a light-dependent oscillation that cycles at a 4-h rhythm. Cell cycle dependent oscillations of Drosophila melanogaster in vitro cell extracts exhibit a variation in the number of clock pulses per interval of 6 h. The oscillator that we report here is located in the polytene IES5-E locus, which is a common recombination hot spot. IES5 is a member of the group of well-characterized and highly conserved transcriptional-translational gene loops and is described in D. melanogaster, D. pseudoobscura, and D. virilis. Our 4 h oscillations are composed of 3-4 distinct periods and therefore share some of the characteristics of a circadian clock
