Download it once and read it on your Kindle device, PC, phones or tablets.This invention relates to welded steel joints where the metallurgic connection between the members is imparted at a temperature less than that to which they must be subjected for a satisfactory weld. In such cases, it is known to use an interposition of a solder member to join the members together. In one form of this method, the solder member is a solder-plastic interposed between the metal surfaces to be joined and this interposed member is heated to cause the solder to melt, while also being caused to flow, thereby bringing the surfaces together and becoming their metallurgic bonding agent. Such a procedure is carried out, usually, at temperatures at which the steel members can be heated without causing a temperature-induced change in their physical properties. The two members to be joined are brought into contact at the region of their surfaces to be joined in a preliminary fashion, prior to introducing the solder-plastic. There are many special problems that arise in solder welding of such materials as a result of their chemical composition and physical properties. For example, glass-fiber-reinforced plastic composites of many types have extremely poor solder wettability and have a composition or physical properties that preclude substantial wetting of their surfaces during the soldering process. This problem of poor wetting of surfaces to be joined results in non-weldable joints. Another problem with the solder-wetting of thermoplastic composite materials results from the fact that solder flows readily in such composites when they are heated to the temperature in the vicinity of the solder melting point. As a result, the composite joints produced are often so brittle that they will fracture before the solder can flow and form a metallurgically sound joint. It is the purpose of this invention to provide a process and apparatus for overcoming all the above-mentioned problems in a simple and straightforward manner. Another problem arising from the chemical and physical properties of such composite materials is that the solder used to bond the joint does not adhere well to the non-weldable surface. 0cc13bf012

Atrial natriuretic peptide activates guanylate cyclase in the rat distal nephron. Experiments were performed to determine whether atrial natriuretic peptide (ANP) activates tubular guanylate cyclase in the rat distal nephron. Male Sprague-Dawley rats were perfused with Krebs-Ringer bicarbonate buffer containing 10(-7) M ANP in the absence (basal) or presence of the cyclic GMP phosphodiesterase inhibitor 1-(5-isoquinolinesulfonyl)-2-methyl-piperazine (H8). ANP increased urine flow by 50% and urinary cyclic GMP by 79%. The latter response was abolished by inhibition of protein synthesis with cycloheximide (7 microM), indicating that cyclic GMP was cyclic. Basal tubular cyclic GMP was 42% greater in the H8-treated rats than in the basal controls. ANP decreased the cyclic GMP concentration, and this effect was abolished by protein synthesis inhibition. Guanylate cyclase activities in in vitro tubular membrane preparations were similar under basal and ANP-stimulated conditions. The order of potency of various natriuretic peptides was ANP greater than urodilatin greater than brain natriuretic peptide. These results suggest that endogenous ANP activates tubular guanylate cyclase in the rat distal nephron. The ANP effect is natriuretic, likely through cyclic GMP.
