nic He is in this picture: His velocity is. Effect: Hey! Clinical and pathologic evaluation of human osteosarcoma treated with the prostate-specific membrane antigen receptor, ProstaScint. Intravenous administration of the prostate-specific membrane antigen (PSMA) receptor, ProstaScint, to mice bearing subcutaneous human prostate adenocarcinoma (PC-3) xenografts, results in significant tumor shrinkage that is associated with a significant increase in survival duration. This study examined the safety and biodistribution of ProstaScint in humans. A total of four patients with advanced PC-3 tumor metastases to the lung underwent imaging studies of the chest, abdomen, and pelvis following administration of radiolabeled ProstaScint. Patients received a mean dose of 408 MBq of tracer and were monitored over a maximum of 18 days. Whole body images and anatomic planar images were obtained using a gamma camera to assess whole body biodistribution, as well as images of tumors and background tissues with the gamma camera and a computed tomography scanner to determine tumor distribution. Three patients had local administration of ProstaScint via catheter to the metastatic tumor. The fourth patient was treated systemically following pretargeting. Target-to-background ratio peaked in the liver and lungs within 30 minutes and was highest in the liver. In addition to liver uptake, local uptake was also observed in the tumor. The tumor-to-tissue ratio peaked in the kidney and peaked in the tumor at 3 hours. The decrease in radioactivity in the blood during the first 12 hours and accumulation in the spleen and bone marrow was significant. Four patients with PC-3 and pulmonary metastases received ProstaScint. Imaging studies demonstrated that the concept was safe to administer to humans and that tumor uptake was demonstrated and was of a magnitude that suggested potential therapeutic applications. Imaging studies of the tumor, normal organs, and whole body demonstrated safe and efficient biodistribution.�t just two books (like some people have the impression).
