way did Hadrian's Wall protect against a northern invasion?

Hadrian's Wall is a famous Roman structure (map) built between 122–138 AD. It was supposedly built to stop the Anglo-Saxons that were invading in the north of the Roman Empire. The wall was constructed of stone and its purpose was to stop the advance of those invading Saxon tribes, but this plan didn't seem to have worked. The question is: in what way did it protect the Roman Empire against the invasion?

A: Hadrian's Wall was ineffective because it was designed for the defense of the limes, not the defense of the empire. Here is a good history article about the Wall.

Hadrian's Wall was placed along the northern edge of the empire, basically to just block the Germans' advance in the north. It was never intended to stop the frontier from being overrun by German tribes, who would enter the empire at the traditional crossing points. It was intended to slow them down and cause them trouble, so that the empire could back the army in forts more easily.

The Wall was originally an outpost of the limes, a line of stone fortifications constructed to protect the Limes Germanicus in northern Britannia from similar, and more efficient, German tribes, and to keep them from infiltrating the Roman Empire. It would have been impossible to mount an effective defense along the entire line of the Wall. The Romans simply had not the funds to build a wall along the entire line of Hadrian's Wall. The Hadrian's Wall was never designed to prevent all non-Roman tribes from entering Roman territory. More tribes than the Saxons and the Frisii would have entered.
