The review was posted on 2014-04-22...»This invention relates to a rotary solid-shank tool and more particularly a rotary tool with a solid shank having a series of slots on its outer periphery which act to hold a number of cutting inserts in their radially operable positions, these cutting inserts being disposed on the shank in a manner permitting relative axial movement between the shank and the inserts which is effected by axial movement of the side of the shank (including the radially outward surface which is in adjacency with the mounting surface) relative to the insert receiving slots of the shank. The invention further relates to solid-shank rotary tools utilizing rocker arms each of which acts as a rotating support for at least one cutting insert to be indexed in radially slotted portions of a solid shank.
