Vascular occlusive phenomena were studied in 40 patients who had sustained a recent myocardial infarction (MI) and in another 25 patients who had survived a large MI with normal coronary arteries. All patients had a follow-up examination at least 10 years after the initial onset of symptoms and signs. A variety of vascular occlusive phenomena (VO) was observed and evaluated after a 20-year interval. Symptoms that occurred frequently (or predominantly) were: leg ulcers (37%), venous hypertension (37%), leg edema (33%), and chronic venous insufficiency (CVI) (30%). The time of onset of these complications varied, with leg ulcers developing most frequently within 6 weeks of the initial MI, leg edema usually within 6 months, and CVI after 1-3 years. Mortality was found in 27% of the patients. Frequent complications included leg edema and CVI, but ulceration occurred infrequently. Multiple correlations were seen between initial clinical and laboratory parameters, and possible subsequent complications in the patients with MI. Arterial abnormalities, both prior to and after the MI, were associated with venous changes. VO were related to a previous MI, and the presence of VO correlated with the previous history and clinical course of the MI. A greater risk of VO was noted in patients who had angina at the time of the initial examination. DOWNLOAD License: Product Type: Genre: Category: Platform: Developer: NA.
