Studying the influence of genetics (genomics) and gene expression (transcriptomics) has led to the systematic identification of numerous molecules that are involved in important biological processes. However, the precise role of each of these genes and their products during the various steps of a given biological process, is still poorly understood. Therefore, the analysis of a patient's genome and transcriptome can only reveal an outline of what is going on inside that patient, rather than its precise molecular correlate. To address this question, new methods for analyzing a precise set of molecules at a specified time and place in various physiological processes in a given patient are being developed. The aim is not only to understand better the disease, but also to develop new drugs to treat it.
