I have installed Windows Server 2016 on a VM to test. I started to read up on what I can use to limit tasks running on the server and how to control the RAM usage. My question is when and how would I use the Task Manager and what would be the right measures to use it? A: I've only used Task Manager to debug and troubleshoot a couple of times. I'm not sure how you're going to be using this server... there are more useful ways of using Linux than Windows. If you have a specific issue you want to understand or fix, you might as well work through that in a debugger. For example, a few years ago I had a Windows Server and I'd set up multiple virtual private servers which would share the virtual machine disk space - I would need to limit the memory used on the virtual machine because every time I restarted a service or changed a config on a Windows box it would use a huge amount of resources. So, I would use Task Manager to bring the VM up, step through the code which caused it to eat memory, stop the service which was consuming the memory. Then, I'd start debugging, and when I found the line of code which was using a ton of resources, I'd comment it out and
