Since its introduction in 1984, cephalosporin antibiotics have become one of the most important classes of antibacterials available to clinicians. In recent years there have been at least five new cephalosporins approved or reintroduced for use, and many more are undergoing clinical trials. The increasing role of the cephalosporin group of antibiotics has highlighted the need for continued vigilance in the development of new members of this class. Some have suggested that cephalosporins may represent a prototype new antibiotic class, the'short-list' antibiotics. These have some of the same characteristics as the classical short-list antibiotics with an antibacterial spectrum and activity that are constrained by a minimal inhibitory concentration (MIC) value of 6d1f23a050
