
Nh3t W56 Change Language VERIFIED

You set or modify your browser's preferences in the Options dialog box. To change the browser's default language, go to the Tools menu on the browser and click Languages. (Some browsers offer this option as a Menu bar item.) Imagine you work for a company that sometimes uses English on the Internet, but sometimes uses Spanish. To make everything easier for your coworkers, you change the default language in your browser to Spanish. Then, when you visit a site such as the site below, the page is displayed in Spanish. All major browsers will let you choose the language used when you access the Internet. You can use the list of languages in your browser's preferences to set your preferred languages. Every time you load a website or enter a page, your browser will check with the Web server. The server responds with a page that includes the list of languages available to that particular site. This is a list of browsers and their settings for displaying the drop-down menu of languages available to the site they are accessing. The first couple of entries in the list are the most often-used languages, so they appear at the top. Older browsers are listed alphabetically, and a special group of countries are listed below them. When a browser is looking for the list of languages, it is often searching for the language tag. The language tag is a small but important piece of information that provides the browser with the information it needs to display the page correctly. Many websites offer content in more than one language, and the language displayed can depend on where the browser is being used. Some browsers allow you to change the language for some websites, but not for others.
