As Bill Lann Lee, the Executive Director of NYU CDUHR said, “ Powder cocaine and crack are different drugs in different respects, but the recent headlines about the 100-to-1 ratio disparity between crack and powder cocaine are more than unjust. They are a warning that the law is not working. We need to try something else. And we need to understand what it is about crack that makes it different so we can use this knowledge to end the crack epidemic. While black and other racial/ethnic groups may use crack more often, they are less likely to be arrested for crack use, which is linked to poor socioeconomic status. However, crack users in these groups are more likely to use more frequently, increasing their risk of arrest and perhaps incarceration. Among users of either drugs, crack users were significantly more likely than powder cocaine users to be arrested. When researchers controlled for characteristics associated with being arrested, crack users were about 6 times as likely as powder cocaine users to be arrested. Among powder cocaine users, use of crack was not significantly associated with being arrested and, therefore, such persons were less likely than powder cocaine users to be arrested. Persons who have an arrest record with either drug are more likely than those without an arrest record to be arrested with crack or powder cocaine. Crack use was more likely to be related to the number of days users spent in jail, indicating that jail provides access to drugs, says Dr. Palamar. This increases the likelihood of future arrest. Having an arrest record increased the likelihood of arrest for both crack and powder cocaine use, but it was statistically significant only for crack use.
