A: Sure, for the common case you want to exit the xsl:for-each when the result-tree is empty. But there are a couple of issues with that, depending on what you're trying to do with the empty results. xslt 2.0 had the unordered-map way, but it was removed in XSLT 3, because it is conceptually wrong to have an order in which maps are evaluated, but it's quite useful to know that xslt 2.0 does allow for it. When xslt 2.0 does it, it will generate the correct, but empty result tree. xslt 1.0 does not have the way to check
