What's New In?

A malware-loaded executable appears to be a legitimate application that offers its user the chance to purchase items and/or books. However, it is in fact a Trojan which is specifically aimed at the users' privacy, with the aim of stealing their personal data and banking credentials. It often creates a shortcut on the desktop in order to add itself to the Autorun. Typical symptoms: Your computer will be vulnerable to infections, the reason being that you may accidentally click on the corrupted link or open an attachment, which will then lead to the launch of this malware. Once it is loaded, it will start monitoring your system for information that can be used to login to online banking websites. Once it has gathered all the needed information, it will use the browser's back button to load a page on a banking website, making it appear as if you are browsing normally. For example, it will pretend that you are browsing the page to purchase items through Amazon. The Trojan will pretend to be the browser and will start to look for accounts. It will also try to register its presence by placing a "save" cookie on the system. Also, it will pretend to be the browser's navigation bar, so that users will be able to browse the Internet easily. In order to deceive the user, it will even allow him/her to log into the banking website to check out the amount of money that is available. As the user is now logged into the banking website, the malware will use the browser's back button to load the shipping application, and the user will be able to purchase items or books. The shipping application will then send the user's log-in details to the "shipping" email account that the malware has previously sent its information to. When the user receives the log-in details, he/she will need to enter them in order to check out the order. This is where the infection comes into play, as the malware will create a back link to the shipping application and will include the user's personal details, such as the last four digits of the user's credit card number, into the shipping email. That is, the user will receive the shipping details on his/her email and will check out the order to his/her credit card. Because the malware has the user's payment details, it will be able to make online purchases without a password or other verification. Once the user has made the online purchase, the malware will then initiate the delivery of the item, which will result in some sort of "wishful thinking" where the user will get an email notification from his/her browser's navigation bar about the order. Typically, the malware will then try to persuade the user to click on a link which, in turn, will take the user to the shipping application. Upon clicking on the link, the user will be redirected to the shipping application
