PDF Split Multiple Files Software has been tested in several stages. It can help split several PDF files simultaneously, and you can easily send several smaller PDF files as emails. With the recent passage of the Consumer Protection Act (CPA), there has been a heightened awareness of privacy on the part of consumers. Consumers are becoming more sensitive to the way companies use and disclose information about them. The CPA has made it clear that personal information that you give a company must be used only for the purpose for which it was collected. E-mail marketing has become the most accepted form of direct marketing, allowing marketers to stay in touch with existing clients as well as with potential clients. The CPA has made it clear that a company may collect and disclose personal information from you only if the company knows that you give it voluntarily, and only for the purpose of the transaction. In this e-mail marketing climate, it is important to know that there is a fine line between the collection of personal information and the selling of it. If your e-mail recipients complain about receiving unwanted e-mails that they did not authorize, you may be at risk for CPA violations. This issue is of particular concern to businesses that use e-mail as a key marketing tool. E-mail recipients can block e-mail from certain sender IP addresses, and that can result in a client list being incomplete. If a business uses e-mail to send marketing messages for products and services, a mismatch between the information you have about your clients and the information you have about your clients might result in CPA violations. E-mail marketing experts report that companies are not always successful at explaining to their clients why they need the information they are collecting. If you are in the business of gathering data about your clients, it is important to get clear authorization for the collection of the information. The CPA states that the company may ask for personal information such as name, telephone number, and e-mail address. The CPA also states that the company may collect data about online purchases and other transactions. The CPA makes clear that the data can be collected only if the company knows the person's name and the reason for collecting the data. If you collect data about a client and the company's service is not satisfactory, you are violating the CPA. The CPA also makes clear that in the case of services such as credit applications, the company can collect information about clients, but it must tell them why it is collecting
