It's not all that realistic, but the addition helps Adobe put the tablet app in its place. Android apps are supposed to make your life easier but they rarely do—much to the frustration of designers who are used to creating artwork on a computer. Whether they're writing copy or sitting down to present a concept, we can all benefit from the perspective of having others around us who are fully versed in the subject at hand. So, imagine if I told you that you could learn at a fraction of the cost and time of going to school or taking a class? Well, that's just what I was able to do as a fresh graduate student at Carnegie Mellon in the 1990s... And it worked! I was a college freshman with an eye on business, sociology, and history. But what I needed was a master's in something people couldn't outsource. Sure, I could spend $40,000 and travel to Boston for an intensive week of writing, but you can't outsource the heart. And you can't outsource the human experience. So I went back to school. I took two courses—the first was the theory of how corporations responded to environmental concerns and how the public policy system worked. Enrolled in another course entitled Cancelling Glaciers and Saving Eskimos, this one covered the shock waves from anthropogenic climate change and the corresponding policy reactions. A third course detailed how corporations/governments took advantage of opportunities created by new regulatory and environmental legislation and how they used third party consultants to justify doing so.
